The Golden Pencil

A Revolutionary Discovery

In a cave in Greenland, the date September 7, 2012, archaeologists Bethany Davidson and Joseph McCallis and led a team of explorers through the dark gray caverns and tunnels of a cave. The ceiling of the cave dripped icy water, and puddles surrounded the explorers. After about an hour of walking down the chilled halls, they all came to a large golden space in the cave. There was a golden waterfall running down a wall, filled with jewels and nuggets of gold. Beth and Joe told the explorers to continue, hoping to find even more. As they did just that all of the explorers grabbed as much gold and jewelry as they could and then made their way to a stream in the middle of the cave. They only had to trek over the stream for just a few minutes before they found the legendary golden pencil.

- The team came to a large golden hole in the cave.

Beth's group was bustling with excitement as she showed everyone the pencil. Inscribed on it was ancient Viking writing:

“The person who has found this pencill must give it to someone Else within a day; if they don't they will lose it, thus the history in this pencil will be lost[e]. Behold, behind this pencill is a scroll telling the story of the pencill. ψ”

So Joseph, Beth and the explorers took the pencil and scroll and ventured quickly to London, England, UK, to send the pencil to a lab some trustworthy colleagues worked at. Here's the discovered story of the pencil:

Henrick was a boy living in a castle in present day Greenland. His father was the Lord of Ymer Øer. He loved his mother dearly, and she made him very happy. But one day, enemies from up attacked the castle and took Henrick's mother away. (The lab workers think the enemies were dwarves, but aren't sure.) Of course, Henrick was very sad, and wanted revenge on the dwarves. So one night, he took his horse Benjamin and rode it up through the mountains to what is now today probably Ellesmere Island, an island in Canada. Here he bravely fought the dwarves, and rescued his mother from being held prisoner by the enemies. For his brave fighting, Odin, the Norse god of war, gave Henrick a golden pencil, which introduced the pencil to all of Europe.

Business

Hogg Press is open! Hogg Press President Jon is currently focusing on making books and magazines for the Hogg Library, but he also has released and opened an official Hogg Press website! It is located at hoggpress.weebly.com

The website mostly features Hogg Press' free and fun computer games, and tells news about Hogg Press products.

Thank you for taking a look at this magazine.

We hope you enjoyed it.

A new magazine is released seasonally.
